PREFACE.

It is unnecessary to assign any reason for submitting the following pages to the inspection of the Public. The Editor presumes that he will easily be believed, when he says that his motive is disinterested. The Manuscript, by the purest accident possible, came, several years ago, into his possession: he esteemed it a curiosity, and thinks that its publication may illustrate a very interesting period of the history of his native Country; besides, he values it as a very remarkable document, to shew the rapid progress of the human mind, and the consequent improvement of the state of society. Let the Philosopher examine the history of Scotland at the period described in these pages, when Arts and Science were in their cradle, and when even every domestic comfort was uncertain : Then let him examine the present period, and see what the effects of a steady mild government are,—London, the emporium of commerce,—Edinburgh, the modern Athens,—our Philosophers, our Historians, bearing off the palm,—our Countrymen, the bravest of Soldiers, —and our Country herself, high in the estimation of the Nations of the World.

INTRODUCTION.

On the death of Charles II., James Duke of York ascended the Throne, without any opposition, by the title of James VII. Whatever objections had, in the preceding reign, been made to a popish successor, there was no party now to resist or disturb James in his designs. An ambiguous declaration was made, that he would never depart from his just prerogatives, nor invade the established government in church or state. This he laid down on the faith of a prince, whose word had never yet been forfeited, which he represented as a security above all law. No sooner, however, did he find himself securely seated on the Throne, than he proceeded to act in the most despotic manner, by causing certain laws to be enacted, in consequence of which a number of the nobility, clergy, and others, in Scotland and England, exiled themselves from their native country, and took refuge in Holland, where the Earl of Argyle had remained since his escape, from a most iniquitous sentence, pronounced against him in 1681, which remains an indelible stain on the reign of Charles II.

James continued to proceed in his oppressive measures; the country became disaffected; a correspondence had been carrying on, for some time past, with the exiles in Holland, by which a double insurrection was projected,—in England under the Duke of Monmouth, who had retired to Holland, and in Scotland under the Earl of Argyle. Monmouth, after landing in England, was defeated, taken prisoner, and beheaded. After Argyle had landed in Scotland, every effort was made to raise the clans, but without effect, as he could only muster about two thousand five hundred men. With these forces he made a descent into the low-lands; where, from various causes, his army dispersed, and he himself, in the attempt to escape, was made prisoner, and carried to Edinburgh. Here he suffered many indignities, and was beheaded in consequence of the sentence passed upon him in 1681, from which he had escaped, as already mentioned.*

* See Extract from Council record, pag. 121.

Thus fell the great and illustrious Archibald Earl of Argyle, amidst the tears and lamentations of the people; a nobleman strongly attached to the Protestant interest, whose descendants powerfully exerted themselves in favour of the Hanoverian succession to the Throne of Great Britain and Ireland.

To shew the unrelenting cruelty of James, after the death of Argyle and Monmouth, two medals were struck upon the occasion; on one of which are the heads of Argyle and Monmouth placed on altars, the bleeding bodies beneath, with an inscription: Sic Aras et Sceptra tuemur; on the other, their heads upon spikes, and the inscription, Ambitio malesuada ruit.—The death of these two noblemen, in place of confirming James's authority, first contributed to his ruin. 'The 'merciless and bloody circuit, or, as unfeelingly styled 'in James's letters, the campaign of Jefferies, destroyed 'the apparent popularity with which his reign had com-'menced. In these letters, he says, Lord Chief Justice is 'making his campaign in the west; Lord Chief Justice 'has almost done his campaign; he has already con-'demned several hundreds, some of whom are already

'executed, more are to be, and the others sent to the 'plantations. The concise and humane language of a 'Father of his people!' *

'Elated at the destruction of his enemies, or ra-'ther intoxicated with uninterrupted success, James 'condescended no longer to dissemble his bigotry or 'his designs. In his speech to the English parlia-'ment, he announced abruptly his resolutions to 'maintain a standing army, and to dispense with 'the penal laws and tests; and no explanation was 'necessary to convince the nation, that the former was 'intended to establish arbitrary power, and the latter to 'introduce the catholics into the church and state. The 'parliament might have acquiesced in the most arbi-'trary power which the sovereign could assume; but it 'was dissolved in anger, as it hesitated to betray the re-'ligion, together with the liberties of the nation; and 'from that moment, while his precipitate violence conti-'nued to increase, it is observable that his authority be-'gan to decline. His good faith, moderation, and judg'ment were universally distrusted; and the attachment 'of his protestant subjects was dissolved.' *

After the death of Argyle, the troops of the Duke of Gordon, the Marquis of Athole, and Strathnaver, including their plundering attendants, committed cruel ravages on the estates and tenantry of the county of Argyle, of which the following is a particular enumeration. The author we are at a loss to name with a degree of certainty; however, we may presume to say, (from p. 31. line 7 from the bottom, and p. 36. line 13. from the top,) it has been drawn up by a son of Mr William Ewing of Bernice, who probably held some part of the adjoining estate of Belzie, as well as part of his father's lands in lease. From the minuteness of its execution, it appears to have been done with a view to be presented to parliament, for a remuneration of the losses sustained, and most probably about the time the title and estates were restored to the late Earl's son, which was the 1st of August 1689, or at least on that day it received the royal assent.

* Laing, vol. IV. pages 168, 169.

The Earl being thus restored, we find him, in parliament, stating his damages during his father's forfeiture, viz. the rent of his estate, from 1681 to 1689, at £5000 per annum, £40,000; and his losses sustained by other damages, such as household furniture, and other moveables, destroying of woods and plantations, the loss of bonds for great sums of money, writings of his lands, and other injuries, to the amount of £20,000; in all, £60,000 sterling.*

Throughout the whole the orthography of the manuscript is followed. In some parts there is a variation in spelling the names of places, which the editor observed, but would not take upon himself to deviate from the original. The estimates are all given in Scots money, the mode of reckoning at the time, for which cause, a table is added, whereby the value may be converted into the present currency. Wherever the letter M occurs it signifies Merks Scots.

END OF THE MANUSCRIPT.

The preceding pages exhibit an Account, the most singular, we believe, to be found on record in the annals of Scotland. To what is there stated, of the indiscriminate plundering committed on the Clan Campbell, and their followers, in the county of Argyle, during the eventful years 1685 and 1686, by the troops of James VII., and their attendants; it may be added, that wherever they came they spread desolation; the hoary head, and the yet infant children, were forced to the woods and wilds, without a morsel to preserve a miserable existence; their houses being pillaged, burnt, or destroyed. Many of the name of Campbell were put to death; and the troops wished to have executed the late Earl's son, (who was then ill of a fever,) at his father's gate; but application having been timeously made to the privy-council, they were prevented from carrying their cruel intention into execution. The common jails were crowded with prisoners; and not thinking them safe in Argyle, they were sent to Dunnotter Castle, in Kincardineshire, where they were confined in loathsome contracted dungeons, and perished daily for want of common subsistence. Numbers were transported to the plantations, deprived of their ears; and many fell victims to the diseases attending long sea voyages.

When it is considered that the events above recorded took place a hundred and thirty years ago, it would be superfluous in this enlightened age to add any remarks. Let us, therefore, turn from such a gloomy picture, and behold happier days, when the descendants of those ancient, but turbulent clans, as well as the scene of their actions, have assumed a new appearance. Without examining into the various causes that have operated in producing this happy change, it may be observed, that the abolition of the heritable jurisdictions, in 1748, appears to have been the first effectual step towards civilization in the Highlands of Scotland. Before that period every baron punished his vassals at his pleasure, without trial and without redress. Gibbets were erected on almost every estate, on which the vassals were executed without any remorse. The establishment of schools for the education of youth,—making roads of communication through its various counties,—encouraging the fisheries upon the coasts; —and, lastly, that great national undertaking, the Caledonian Canal, have all contributed to improve the face of the country, to excite emulation and industry,—to enlighten the minds of the inhabitants,—and to render their situation in every respect more comfortable.

The Highlanders were first called into the service of their country shortly after 1715, at which time they only consisted of two companies, and were to act, as fencible men, against those who committed depredations in the various counties of the Highlands. One of the companies was commanded by Lord Lovat, the other by Lord Loudon. They obtained the name of Black Watch, from giving protection to property against levying of black maill; a custom then prevailing in the Highlands, of raising a sum from each proprietor, to protect his property against robbers. About the year 1739, by the interest of Lord Semple, then their colonel, they were put on a new establishment, and ranked as the 42d regiment of the line. Afterwards they were ordered to England, as we find them reviewed on Finchley Common, 14th May 1743, by General Wade. Under the administration of the immortal Chatham, we find him calling out the hardy sons of the north. Their deeds in the field of Quebec bore ample testimony to the choice he had made. In every quarter where the British troops have been engaged since that period, to the recent and ever-to-be-remembered field of WATERLOO! we shall find the Highlanders the first in the attack, and the last in the retreat!—Thus, their condition, as described in the preceding pages, happily will not apply now; one hundred and thirty years have produced great changes. Now there is not a more loyal, brave, or faithful body of men in the British service, than our Scottish Highlanders.

EXTRACT FROM COUNCIL RECORD, Vol. 31. p. 186.

'Edinburgh, 29*th June* 1685.

'The same day Bailie Robertson and Bailie Spence produced an order 'from the Lords of the Justiciary, for executing the late Earl of Argyle; 'which being read, the council appoints the same to be recorded in the 'council-books, whereof the tenor follows:—" Forswameikle as Archibald 'Campbell, lait Earle of Argyle, as being found guilty of the cryme of 'treasone, is, by warand of his Majestie's prive counsell, founded on a let-'ter from his sacred Majestie, adjudged by us to be taken to ye mercate-'cross of Edinburgh, on the threttie day of this instant month of June '1685 years, and ther, betwixt two and five of the clock in the afternoon, 'to be beheaded; and thereafter his head to be affixed on the tolbuith of 'Edinburgh, on ane high piece of irone: These therefor require and com-'mand the magistrates of Edinburgh to see the sd sentence and dome put 'to deu execution in all poynts, as they will be answerable. 'GEORGE DRUMMOND, Provost.'

In a letter from Dunoon, 5th March 1816, we are informed, that 'after 'the death of Argyle, his body was conveyed to Newbattle, in the county 'of Mid-Lothian, and there deposited in the family vault of the Marquis 'of Lothian, his son-in-law. In 1703 it was removed to Kilmun, the bury-'ing place of the family of Argyle, situated in the united parishes of Du-'noon and Kilmun.'

Since the preceding communication, the following has been received.

SIR,

In answer to your letter of the 2d March, current, relative to your inquiries respecting the Argyle family, I beg leave to inform you, that I was well acquainted with one Andrew Brown, a near relation of my own, with whom I had many conversations about occurrences that passed in his lifetime. He was nearly 104 years of age when he died, having been born in the parish of Inverchallen, on Easter-day 1674, and was buried at Dunoon, Christmas 1777.—He told me, he remembered well the arrival of the Marquis of Athol in the county of Argyle, and the cruel ravages he there committed on the inhabitants. How the heroic Mrs Campbell of Dergachy, in the parish of Kilmun, when her husband's property was plundered by the troops of Athol, followed to the camp, on the borders of the district of Lennox or Dumbartonshire, where she was delivered of a son (in the camp), who was christened John, after the Marquis. No sooner was the Marquis informed of the circumstance, by the doctor and chaplain, than he gave strict orders, that every attention should be paid, that the situation of the lady required; and, on her recovery, the property was restored, with which she returned to Dergachy House; and her memory has often since been celebrated in Gaelic song.

Andrew Brown also stated, that, on the 27th day of June 1703, he attended at Dunglas, along with the numerous vassals, or military tenantry of Argyle, who had been summoned, according to the common form used on such occasions, to assemble there, in order to accompany the remains of Archibald, first Duke of Argyle, and those of his father and grandfather, to the place of interment, at Kilmun.

Archibald was created Duke by King William III. in 1701, and died at Newcastle, on his way to Scotland, in 1703. On his remains being brought to Edinburgh, they were joined by those of his two predecessors, Archibald, Marquis of Argyle, and Archibald, ninth Earl, who had been deposited in the family vault of the Marquis of Lothian at Newbattle, since their execution in 1661 and 1685. From Edinburgh they were carried to Dunglas, a place situated on the banks of the river Clyde, about four miles east from Dunbarton. Here a suitable entertainment was provided for the numerous company who attended. After which, the remains of the Marquis and Earl were shown; their heads properly disposed in their places in the coffins. This ceremony having ended, the remains of these three illustrious personages were put on board of a principal barge, decorated with suitable devices. They sailed down the Clyde, the 27th day of June 1703, with the numerous attendants arranged under their various chieftains; and the procession was closed, by a band of national musicians playing high martial airs. The Highlanders were at this period an unmixed people, attired in their native garb, all using the same language, as well as uniformity in dress. As they passed Dunbarton Castle, the fortress saluted with minute guns.

The day was fine, and the declining western sun shone beautifully on the numerous whole. Having at length arrived at Kilmun, the burying-place of the family of Argyle, and having performed the usual ceremonies on such occasions with all due solemnity, the three were interred under ground. Archibald, the third Duke of Argyle, who died at London in 1761, and deposited here, is the first coffin to be seen above ground.

This Andrew Brown, who lived in the reign of seven princes, was in the parish church of Inverchallen, when a messenger, from Inverary, bearing the orders of William III, entered, and forced Mr M'Arthur, the Episcopal clergyman, from his pulpit, and locked the church door. None of that persuasion in the Highlands could be prevailed upon to acknowledge King William, but as a base and unnatural usurper; and the massacre of Glenco, committed by his knowledge and authority, in 1692, has thrown a stain on his reign and memory in the eyes of posterity. During his reign of thirteen years, said my old relative, the frost was so intense, that, in the months of May, the usual period for casting the peats, which they burn as fuel in those parts, the moss was so frozen that the spade could not penetrate; but on the happy accession of Queen Anne, the heat of the sun during that summer became so great, as to kindle the moss-covered mountains of Morven.

I am,

SIR,

Your most humble Servant,

(Signed) JOHN BROWN.
